BIO: Dr. Stotra Chakrabarti is an Assistant Professor of Animal Behavior and Conservation in the Department of Biology, Macalester College, Minnesota, USA. Through empirical and synthetic approaches that incorporates observational fieldwork, geo-spatial and statistical analyses, and genetic/genomic applications, Chakrabarti's research program investigates the links between fundamental animal behavior and applied conservation, with large mammals (especially carnivores) as focal species. His research also explores human-nature relationships across diverse socio-cultural landscapes. Chakrabarti's research program is aimed to support and train the next generation of behavioral ecologists and conservation biologists, through mentorship of undergraduate and graduate scholars, and training programs for forest managers and policy makers. His award-winning teaching experience currently includes senior-level and core-courses in Animal Behavior, Wildlife Conservation, Wildlife Monitoring Techniques, and Ecology & Environment at a liberal-arts setting. Chakrabarti's lab actively communicates science through conventional and popular formats. Chakrabarti's curiosity in the natural world began with a childhood spent watching leopards and elephants in the vicinity of where he grew up: the foothills of Himalayas in India. While his cultural upbringing instilled deep reverence for wild animals, he also experienced the threats such wildlife can pose to lives and livelihoods. Subsequently, an immersive and rigorous graduate program at the Wildlife Institute of India cemented his interest in animal behavior and conservation biology. Currently he and his lab, with a robust community of collaborators, studies lions in India and East Africa, carnivore interactions in Yellowstone National Park (USA) and Argentina, and human-wildlife interactions in India, Kenya, Tanzania and USA.
